What is ePublishing?

The big push in every school district across America is the emphasis on literacy and writing across the curriculum. ePublishing, or electronic publishing, is the umbrella term for a type of publishing that exists in a digital format. It does not include printed materials. E-publishing takes the format of written works published online, on CD, or provided in a file format such as a PDF or other document compatible with handheld electronic devices such as iPad, Iphones, Itouches, and smartphones. These works can also be posted on websites and sent to others via email.

Many professions now exist that didn't 20 years ago, online through the use of the Internet. One such profession is writing articles, and blogs for various websites. With the convenience of internet access, people could now write in their pajamas at home and submit their written works of art to their employers and publishers from home.

The good news here is that students could learn to write and use technology (computer and web skills) in any of their classes. The skills and guidelines they would need for a real writing profession in the future can be easily translated into assignments that they do in their classes. The assignments and projects they are given should be standards-based and developed to simulate what they would deal with in their future workplaces. Our students should be prepared for a 21st century world using 21 st century skills.
